The Busan High Level Forum on Aid Effectiveness (HLF4) forged a new global partnership amongst high-level political leaders of donor governments, emerging economies, aid recipients, the private sector, and civil society. With the global monitoring framework and future architecture to be agreed upon in June, this session will explore how the development community can ensure that the groundwork laid in Busan will lead to better development impact. Whereas previous forums in Paris and Accra were about technical aspects of aid effectiveness, the wide array of Busan stakeholders recognized that politics matter to effective development and the world requires a robust monitoring framework to drive political change.

Questions to be considered include:

- How can we ensure the political change necessary to meet policy commitments?
- How will different countries operationalize “shared principles, common goals and differential commitments” for effective development and ensure everyone is working from the same page?
- How can we ensure that cooperation towards development effectiveness fulfills rights and addresses both political and technical development challenges?

If you are interested in attending, please RSVP to apolglase@oxfamamerica.org and register for accreditation by Tuesday, April 10 here.
